seross the ocean; and, perhaps, some of your young readers might take an interest in some of the ways we had of amusing ourselves. The ship was named the Scotland, and one of the rules was that no passenger was allowed to go into the forecastle. This to me was very hard, as my great ambition at that age was to become a sallor, and it was a great treat for me when I could hear a real sailor talk and see them working at their oraft.

Well, one day a sailor heard me playing my concertina sit, and beckened me to go forward, where he and his measumates were emboying their orat between bells. One of the sailors could play that concertina in a manner that won my boyish heart, and another took off his hat and danced such a hornpipe as I have never seen since.

Then they took me into the forecastle and showed me the great cable and anchors, and laid me in a hammook in true sailor fashion. After they had given me a few sips of very strong rum out of a bottle they were passing and a sea-biscuit as hard as a nail. I went down to dinner feeling as proud as a pirate king.
